Submission of Material for Publication

Interested parties are welcome to submit primary source material and journal articles for publication in Muscogiana. Submissions should either be printed on 8½ x 11 paper and mailed to the editor at the address listed below or saved as a Word document and emailed to sprayberry_gary @colstate.edu. To be considered for publication, material must be of cultural, historical and/or genealogical significance to the Columbus/Original Muscogee County, Georgia, area that consists of Harris County, Talbot County, Marion County, Chattahoochee County, and the current Muscogee County. All articles should be footnoted according to the Chicago Manual of Style, and should be 1000 to 5000 words in length. The Editor and the Editorial Board make final decisions on the acceptance of material for publication. Neither the Muscogee Genealogical Society nor Columbus State University can accept responsibility for errors or inaccuracies in material submitted for publication.

Book Reviews

Book reviews of both local titles and general genealogical monographs are accepted for inclusion in Muscogiana. Reviews should be 350-750 words, and should contain an overview of the work and an analysis on the value of the work to genealogists and other researchers in the region. The editor maintains a list of books for review, which is available on request.

Queries

Queries are welcome from members and non-members. Queries are limited to one per issue. There are no charges for queries.

Sponsors

We invite and encourage businesses and individuals to sponsor the publication of Muscogiana. The suggested rates are as follows:

1/4 page $25.00                         Whole page $100.00
1/2 page $50.00

From the Editor's Desk

For this issue, we offer up a veritable feast for connoisseurs of Columbus and Chattahoochee Valley history. In “The Island Mystery,” Jesse “Buddy” Williams seeks an answer to why islands in the Chattahoochee River in Muscogee and Harris Counties were once numbered. Williams offers readers a glimpse into his research methodology and provides several key documents he uncovered while trying to solve his “mystery.” At the end, he challenges genealogists and local historians to help him solve it. For the second piece, “Bibb City, Collected Lives from a Mill Town: Interpreting a Community for the Community,” Dr. Amanda Rees and Dr. Becky Becker, professors at Columbus State University, describe “a unique multi-disciplinary project” they directed in May 2009. The project involved more than forty CSU students, who conducted oral interviews, researched the history of Bibb City, devised a walking tour of the community, created a ten-panel exhibit, and, finally, wrote and performed an hour-long play based on the oral histories. The walking tour, written by one of the student participants, Mindy Gillow, has been included in this issue. In the fourth piece, Dr. Virginia Causey, history professor at CSU, describes some of the fascinating tidbits of information she has uncovered while conducting research for an upcoming history of Columbus. Once completed, her book will be the first “academic analytical history” of the Fountain City. Last, we offer a brand new section for Muscogiana called the “Local History Corner,” which will appear in the fall edition of the journal. In it, we will profile various individuals who have researched and written about Columbus and the Chattahoochee Valley region. Dr. John Lupold, former CSU history professor and author of Bridging Deep South Rivers: The Life and Legend of Horace King, has been profiled for this issue.

Finally, I would like to again invite readers to send in their submissions. We need good book reviews, articles, queries, primary sources, and genealogy for upcoming issues. If you are working on something, please send it to me at: Gary S. Sprayberry, Department of History & Geography, Columbus State University, 4225 University Avenue, Columbus, GA, 31907. Or you can send an electronic copy to me at sprayberry_gary@colstate.edu.

The Island Mystery

by

Jesse Lamar Williams

To me, researching history is fascinating and intriguing. To others it is just trivial. Sometimes it is hard to find anyone who shares my passion for history. That is why I am honored to bring this before people who may be able to shed some light upon the topic. I am not a professional scholar or teacher, but a lover of history, especially the history of Muscogee County, Georgia, and the surrounding Chattahoochee Valley region. Recently, while conducting research on Raphael J. Moses' Equiline Plantation, I ran across some puzzling information in a deed I had uncovered in the county courthouse. On January 31, 1887, R. J. and Elisa M. Moses signed an indenture with the Chattahoochee Falls Company for Eight Hundred and Thirty (830) acres. According to the deed, the property lay on both the Georgia and Alabama sides of the river, and it included Island Number Three in the Chattahoochee River. That sparked my curiosity. How many people in our day and age know that the islands were once numbered? I have asked many people, including Billy Winn, local writer and historian, Dalton Royer, archivist at Columbus State University Archives, and Dr. John Lupold, retired professor of history, what they knew of this, but they had never heard of this matter. The islands in the Chattahoochee River — the ones in Muscogee and Harris Counties, at least — were once designated by numbers. This intrigued me, so I continued to investigate.

In the Muscogee County Courthouse, in the offices of the Clerk of the Superior Court, the deed room is located on the south end of the last aisle to the east. The deed records only date back to 1836 because that year a fire destroyed the Muscogee County Courthouse. I tried to read all of the deeds for the Chattahoochee Falls Company and Columbus Manufacturing Company, as well as the Columbus Factory. I could not find any recorded deeds under the name "Clapp's Factory." This was just a name used by locals when they referred to the factory "three miles north of the City of Columbus”. Julius Clapp had been a part of the management (and later ownership) of the mill from the beginning in 1834 until his death in the early 1870’s. In the old indexes to the deed books, in the far right hand column, there are codes for each indenture or transaction. A description for the codes is supposed to be in the index book but has been removed or lost over the years. To make it easier to locate deeds, I had to teach myself how to read the codes in the index. For instance, “D” stands for deed, “C” stands for city, and “L” stands for lot, which is then followed by a number. Therefore, DCL24 would indicate that the transaction was a Deed for City Lot Twenty-four. If the transaction is for an island, then the word “island” is a part of that code. The Muscogee County Deed Books were microfilmed in the 1960’s and copies of the old deed books can also be found at the Chattahoochee Regional Library.

While researching Island Number Three, I worked under the impression that since it was included in a deed with the Chattahoochee Falls Company it would be the same island upon which one end of the old mill sat. But that cannot be. Here is why: In a deed dated May 24, 1848, John Fontaine conveyed to Charles Stewart half interest in Island Number Three, “the same island granted to John Fontaine by the state of Georgia containing sixteen (16) acres more or less.” But there were no islands of this size in the area of the river where the Chattahoochee Falls Company was located. The small size of this island is evident in a drawing of the mill complex in an 1889 Sanborn Map.

The mystery does not end there. I found a second numbered island while researching the Rock Island Paper Factory. I did not find a number for the Rock Island, but I did locate a reference to the Rock Island’s location. In the Georgia Supreme Court case of Cook v. Winters et al (1881), the Rock Island Factory site is described as the first island below Island Twenty-seven. I know where Island Twenty-seven was located because I know the location of Rock Island. It is in the reservoir created by the Georgia Power’s North Highland Power Plant Dam (also known as the Bibb Dam). The reservoir is known by locals as the Bibb Pond. Before the dam was built, Rock Island covered four acres, but today it only covers two acres because of the water backed up in the reservoir.

I uncovered yet another numbered island while I was actively searching for deeds containing numbered islands in the Chattahoochee River. I have studied the water lots in Columbus extensively. In December 1841, the Columbus mayor and city council agreed to sell to John H. Howard and Josephus Echols all the even-numbered water lots between two and thirty-six on condition that “they shall erect a suitable sufficient and well constructed dam across the Chattahoochee River terminating at the Eastern bank thereof at any point on or above lot number one in the aforesaid drawn plot and survey designated and below the North common lots, so that when said river is at its usual height, five feet of head of water may be obtained on said lot number one.”

Because Howard and Echols were successful, in 1843, the mayor and city council agreed to sell John H. Howard and Josephus Echols the odd numbered lots, one through thirty-seven. Stephen M. Ingersoll already had a gristmill on the Alabama shore about 300 yards above Howard and Echols’ Water Lot One. This mill was probably built even before the construction of Seaborn Jones’ City Mills in 1828. Over the years, there were many lawsuits involving the Columbus Water Lots. The most important lawsuit, and the one relevant here, was Howard et al v. Ingersoll (1851).

In that case the, US Supreme Court decided that Georgia owned the Chattahoochee River to the normal high water limit on the western or Alabama shore. Because Howard and Echols had used their own resources in this endeavor to sue Ingersoll, the State of Georgia wanted to reward them by selling the remaining islands in the Chattahoochee River and giving the proceeds to them. Knowing this, I searched for deeds under the names John H. Howard or Josephus Echols, which is how I found Island Twenty-eight. This island turned out to be the easiest to locate.

Howard for their expenditures, expenses, professional and other services, concerning the boundary line in dispute, between this State and the State of Alabama; and for other purposes therein named,” Acts of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, Passed in Milledgeville, at a Biennial Session, in November, December, January, and February 1853-4, February 18, 1854, p. 520-21.
The first deed concerning Island Twenty-eight is a deed from John L. Moore to John C. Sneed. Next, John C. Sneed sold it to Josephus Echols. The two transactions are on the same page in the deed book.9 There is also a plat drawn and a description in the deed. When Muscogee County was first laid out, except for the Coweta Reserve, it was done so in a plat of blocks that covered about two hundred acres. When they reach the irregular shape of the river, the blocks become fractional. Island Twenty-eight was described as "an island in the Chattahoochee River, containing one acre more or less, and known as number Twenty Eight, opposite fraction number ninety one on the Georgia side of said river."10

A few months back, I learned that the Columbus Enquirer newspaper from 1828 to 1890 had been digitized and put on the Internet by the University of Georgia. I accessed it through Galileo. With the aid of this marvelous resource, I searched for articles containing information on the islands in the Chattahoochee River and found nothing on this subject. Most articles that included the word "island" concerned Cuba or other sea islands. One day, while researching another topic in the Enquirer, I ran across a completely unrelated article about islands in the Chattahoochee River. According to this piece, the properties of Sowell Woolfolk, deceased, were being sold off for the benefit of his heirs. James Wadsworth served as administrator of the sale. These properties included Islands Eight through Fourteen in the Chattahoochee River in Harris County, Georgia, and totaled 232 acres.11 So far, I have not been to the Harris County Courthouse to research these, so I have no idea of their location. This did not cure my fever but only fed the fire.

The puzzle has not been completely solved with the discovery of some plat showing all the numbered islands and the reasons they were numbered. If I had waited until it was solved to write this article, then you would not have been reading it. However, as fate would have it, on the day I started to write this piece, I did make a last ditch effort to find the location of Island Three. And I succeeded. In October 1839, the Columbus Enquirer published an ad by John Bethune, Commissioner of Surveys for the State of Georgia, concerning Island Three. According to the ad, the island contained sixteen acres of second quality land below and nearly opposite the Columbus Factory. It read: "This Island has a beautiful Creek or Branch of the River, running the whole length of the island, which is about a quarter of a mile in length."\textsuperscript{12}

One purpose of this work is to request help in finding a plat(s) and discovering the reason why the islands were numbered. Another is to share this knowledge with others of like mind. I would rather not hoard this treasure of knowledge but spend it on others so they may profit from my research. I know people who do genealogy and only hoard their hard work instead of sharing. When they pass on, all of their hard work and mental gains will be like the sands of time spread like their ashes on the land, only to be hard earned and collected again by another genealogist.

The readers of this article may already know the answers I seek. If so, please let me know. My email address is jessewilliams@columbusga.org. Readers, even if it is five, ten, twenty or more years from now, if you find any piece of the puzzle, please write it down so future history enthusiasts will know. Make it possible for others to find a different puzzle to solve.

Below, I have included a number of documents and other primary sources related to this topic.\textsuperscript{13}

An action of ejectment was brought by the defendant in error on the several demises of Josiah Morris and John G. Winter against Richard Roe, casual ejector, and James C. Cook, as tenant in possession, to recover a parcel of land, with the appurtenances, lying and being in the county of Muscogee and state of Georgia, known as the site of the Rock Island Paper Mills, the dam and all the power, rights, privileges, appurtenances and property of said Rock Island Paper Mills in the Chattahoochee river to high-water mark on the western side of said river, together with the island in said river known as Rock Island, being the island to which the Rock Island Paper Mills extended its dam from the factory site on the Alabama shore, said island being the first island below island number 27, containing four acres.

To this action the defendant, Cook, filed a plea of the general issue. When the case was called for trial, by agreement of counsel, it was consented that the cause

And it is further covenanted and agreed that the right of the city to use the gravel and sand in the river and on the banks on said lots shall be reserved. Provided that in taking away said sand and gravel no injury shall be done to the River Bank or to any works which may be made or erected in pursuance of the contract. And it is hereby further expressly covenanted and stipulated by and between the said parties that the title hereby conveyed shall be subject to all the conditions contained in the aforesaid conveyance to the said Howard and Echols respecting the building of the dam and race or canal therefore mentioned so that the said lots of odd numbers hereby conveyed and for lots of even numbers in said conveyance mentioned shall stand upon the same footing with regard to their liability to revert to said Mayor and Council of Columbus and so that should said lots of even numbers by virtue of said conditions or any part thereof or failure to comply with the same (saving the conditions herein before specified) revert to said party of the first part then the said lots of odd numbers hereby conveyed shall also and for the same cause revert to and become the property of the party of the part and also that the said lots of odd numbers hereby conveyed shall revert to and become the property of the Mayor & Council of the City of Columbus for and on account of the refusal and failure of the said John H Howard to perform his said contract as is herein set forth.

In testimony whereof the Mayor & Council of the city of Columbus (now in session) hereunto signed their names with their private seals opposite thereto and have caused the cooperation seal of said City of Columbus to be hereto attached on this day and year aforesaid.

It was a cool night on the last day of October 2008, when a fire that had raged for several days destroyed most of the massive Bibb Mill in the city of Columbus, Georgia. Located in west central Georgia, the Bibb Mill had been the center of the Bibb City community for over one hundred years. Indeed, it was the very reason the community had been founded. Bibb City is a historically significant community and landscape because it reminds us of the central role of the cotton mill industry in the South, in Georgia, and in the city of Columbus during the twentieth century. Two elements make Bibb City unique. First, unlike most other mill companies in the South that turned away from paternalistic management, Bibb Mill kept its fatherly eye on this segregated company town. Second, with its over two hundred buildings, Bibb City captures two very distinct methods of company town design. The early residential section offers a very dense, unvarying urban, industrial feel, while the new homes (built in the early 1920s) provide more varied architecture situated in a rural landscape that produced the more isolated, rural feel of the countryside.

In response to the dramatic loss of the Bibb Mill, we decided that we needed to commemorate that loss and celebrate this unusual blue-collar community, while at the same time supporting efforts to establish Bibb City as a federally identified Historic District. This multidisciplinary project was created with the work of forty students in four concurrent classes in history, geography, and theatre at Columbus State University during the May semester of 2009.

Theatre students conducted oral history interviews with past and present community members, studied the mill's history, and examined works from the Federal Theatre Project and oral history performers like Anna Deavere Smith. Next, they quilted together the oral histories they had collected to create a performance about the community and its significance to multiple generations. History and geography students explored the art of interpreting historical communities, visited the Columbus Museum to learn more about the art of creating an exhibition, and, using previously created oral histories and archival images, wrote, edited, and produced a ten-panel exhibition that told the story of the community's hundred year history. The hour-long performance (which was video-taped) and the history exhibit were presented in two different locations in Bibb City: at the Opening and Picking Room of Bibb Mill (one of the few mill buildings left intact) and at the Comer Auditorium. Four additional performances were given at the Studio Theatre on the Park on Columbus State University's RiverPark Campus. Students also led five "in character" walking tours of Bibb City for over eighty participants. They created a printable self-guided walking tour of the community, an extensive downloadable audio tour, and a web-site, which includes the play script, the play video, the images and text of the exhibit, a children's exhibit guide, and other educational materials. While eighty people joined in the "in character" walking tours of the community, three hundred people came to see the play and exhibition over three weekends in June 2009. Students then published their research, historical images, the play, text from the exhibit and other educational materials at a web-site hosted by the CSU Archives: http://archives.colstate.edu/digital_collections/bibb_city.php.
Welcome to Bibb City: A Self-Guided Walking Tour

Located on the banks of the Chattahoochee River, Bibb City is a mill village located in Columbus, Georgia. Both the mill and its village opened its doors for business in 1902. Two things make Bibb City unique. First, long after other mill proprietors in the South had abandoned such practices, the management of Bibb Mill kept a paternalistic eye on the village for sixty years. The city remained a separate municipality completely surrounded by the city of Columbus for over ninety years (the town dissolved in 2000). The second unique feature is the design of the community itself. There were two phases of development in Bibb City – what residents used to call the Old Village and the New Village. As the map reveals, the road layout in the northern part of Bibb City differs from the layout in the southern half of the community. The Old Village is located around the mill in the southern section of Bibb City. Old Village roads are laid out on a grid, and the houses sit side-by-side, very close to one another. In contrast, northern Bibb City roads are curved and the homes are laid out along those curves. Streets loop back into each other and do not connect with the major Columbus streets. Little has changed in the community’s housing or its layout in eighty years. As we explore Bibb City, we will see that there are other differences between the Old and New villages.

To begin, start at the Rivermill Event Center located at 3715 1st Avenue in Columbus. The tour should take approximately thirty minutes and is fairly easy to navigate, with only a few small hills and a small flight of stairs.
A. Let's begin at the corner of Porter and Hansen. From here, you can see a clear view of the water tower towards the West (#2 on the map's points of interest, or POI), as well as a great example of the newer housing. These four-room houses were used to board workers. Two families lived in each house as evidenced by the two front doors. Workers and families took great pride in their lives in Bibb City and strove to keep the village nice. The mill owners sponsored clean up days to keep the town tidy and kept a critical eye on residents' gardens.
As you continue north on Hansen Avenue, at the corner where you intersect 40th Street, you find your next stop. Looking north, you can see the Bibb City Elementary School (Figure 2 & POI # 6). The school was the center of community life for years, until the construction of the auditorium. To your left, you can see the Porter Baptist Church (Figure 3 & POI # 5). Unlike most mill towns, Bibb did not force religion on its workers. However, it was greatly encouraged.

From Hansen Avenue, turn left and proceed down 40th street. Near the point where Park Avenue and 40th Street meet, you will find the site of both the community pool (Figure 4) and the former community center, which also functioned as the town’s clinic (POI # 7). You can also look south down Park Avenue for a view of the ten-room boarding houses, which were part of the Old Village’s housing for both families and single boarders. Originally there were twenty-four of these houses, but today many have been destroyed.
D. Continue down 40th Street (or Poplar Street). The site of the former Boy Scout Hut (POI # 8) is just ahead on the left, across from the Bibb Triangle. The original building was destroyed by a storm in 1953, but was rebuilt by April 1954. The house that you see now was built in 2008. Beyond the house, there is a nice view of the Chattahoochee River.

E. Go right on Poplar Street, making your way past the Bibb Triangle (which will be on your left). As you proceed down Poplar Street, stop to check out Hemlock Drive Park (POI #10) to the North, or on your left. From here, you have a great overview of the park. Unlike the older village, the newer village designs included parks and more rural housing. If you look north up Hemlock Drive, there is much more green space, with wide grass medians between the street and the sidewalk.

F. As you approach the corner of 41st Street and Hemlock Drive, you will see the Comer Auditorium (Figure 5 & POI # 9). It was built in July 1941 as a community center. Community basketball tournaments were often held in the Comer. Look up and you will notice a cupola on top of this building, distinguishing it from the surrounding community. Note: Between this point and the final point, you will encounter a small flight of stairs.

G. Continuing on Hemlock Drive, you will notice the housing is closer together. This is considered part of the Old Village. Bibb village residents took pride in keeping their homes clean and properly maintained.
Our final stop on the tour is at the end of Comer Street, which includes a view of the former Bibb Mill (Figure 6 & POI #3). Built in 1902, the mill stretched over 1000-feet long. All the memories that developed in its shadow over the last century resurfaced in a fire in October 2008. Hundreds of people came to watch the mill they had worked in their entire lives burn to the ground. The only part of the long building that remains is the façade – a reminder of the importance of cotton mill life in Bibb City.

Sleuthing through Columbus History

by

Dr. Virginia E. Causey

I have the best job in the world this semester. I have been awarded a sabbatical from Columbus State University to research and write a book on Columbus — an analytical history that begins with the founding of the town in 1827 and brings Columbus history up to the present. It will take much longer than just these few months to complete this project, but having the time to really focus on this one task has been wonderful.

The last attempt at a comprehensive history of Columbus was Etta Blanchard Worsley’s Columbus on the Chattahoochee in 1951. Since then, John Lupold, Clason Kyle, Joseph Mahan, and a few others have published celebratory picture books on Columbus, but no historian has ever published an academic analytical history of Columbus, Georgia, one of the few major cities in Georgia for which this is true. I propose to write such a history.

As anyone who researches history or genealogy knows, I feel like a detective working on a cold case. One source may be a dead end, but often it leads to two or three more sources, which lead to two or three more, and soon you have a bibliography branching in directions that could not have been predicted at the outset.

I’m doing much of my work in the wonderful Columbus State University Archives’ treasure trove of Columbus history. But, funded with a faculty development grant from CSU, I’m also going farther afield. The Georgia Department of Archives and History in Morrow holds many sources related to Columbus, and I’ll spend four or five days there. Much the same is true of archives at the University of Georgia. Other archival collections may not be so obviously related to Columbus. I learned, for example, that in 1864 Augustus Baldwin Longstreet, author of Georgia Scenes and president of Emory at Oxford, fled Sherman’s advance and landed in Columbus for a few months. He apparently was here at the time of the Battle of Columbus. Longstreet's papers are at Emory and I hope to find letters describing his experiences in Columbus in 1864 and 1865.

I spent a few days in the Southern Historical Collection at the University of North Carolina and in the Special Collections Library at Duke. Each has a handful of manuscript collections related to Columbus history, such as Farish Carter's papers at UNC, which focus on his largely unsuccessful Coweta Falls Manufacturing Company. At Duke, I examined the papers of Louis Hamburger, partner of George Parker Swift in Muscogee Mills and other ventures. Some funny episodes related to these collections may not find their way into the book. For example, Louis Hamburger was in New York on business in 1867 and reported to his wife that "trade here is very brisk, the whole City is full of Southerners" (sort of carpetbaggers in reverse, I guess). A woman friend of the family wanted him to get his hair dyed before going home (in 1867!), "but I told her I never would do it."

In November, I'll be at the Library of Congress probing a question I've pondered for years: Why did Helen Augusta Howard, founder of the Georgia Woman Suffrage Association, drop out of the movement in 1895 after devoting five years of her life to it? In an effort to solve that mystery, I'll read correspondence in Susan B. Anthony's and Anna Howard Shaw's papers, as well as sources related to the 1895 convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association meeting, which Augusta and her sisters brought to Atlanta in 1895.

An addictive aspect of research is that the actors who people Columbus' history come alive as I learn more about them, especially in primary sources, such as letters and diaries that flesh them out as real humans with virtues and faults. Some characters become more (or less) admirable to me as I get to know them. One person in Columbus history that I like less now than when I began, for example, is Randolph L. Mott. I had always sort of admired Mott. Local lore held him to be a staunch Unionist during the Civil War. Following the Battle of Columbus, he allegedly told Federal General James Wilson that his residence was the only location in Columbus that had never seceded, and for the duration of the war he flew the American flag from the cupola of his house (now part of the TSYS campus on the Riverwalk).
Mott may have been a Unionist at heart, but he was hardly one in his actions. He never resisted the war, and his gristmills supplied Confederate troops. Wilson, who captured the city in 1865 and established his headquarters in Mott's house, reported that the flag was inside "the dome" of the house, not flown from the cupola where locals would have seen it. Mott was a Republican politician in the postwar years, but supported the moderate agenda, often joining conservative Georgia Democrats to strip hard-won freedoms from African Americans.

Perhaps the most damning evidence about Mott was his partnership with the infamous Charles Augustus Lafayette Lamar of Savannah, who illegally imported slaves from Angola in 1858 aboard the Wanderer. Congress had outlawed the importation of slaves in 1808, but in 1858 the secessionist Lamar decided the South should no longer be governed by U.S. law, so he raised funds from Mott and other partners to bring 487 captive Africans illegally into Georgia. Legend has it that one of those Wanderer slaves was at Mott's home while James Wilson stayed there, and that Mott even tried to give the slave to Wilson (who refused).

Often, however, I have found myself admiring the people I research and wishing I could time-travel to meet them. Four are George W. Ashburn, Primus King, Augusta Howard, and Theo J. McGee. Ashburn may seem a strange choice. He has been vilified in many histories of Columbus as a white Republican "scalawag" responsible for corrupt "negro domination" during Reconstruction, a former overseer who was cruel to slaves, and "the lowest sort of white man" who deserted his wife and took up with negro prostitutes. A mob of about thirty masked white men assassinated him in 1868.

Actually, Ashburn was a committed Unionist who rejected the rule of the planter elite and during the war fought with the northern army to end the "slaveocracy." No doubt he was ambitious and probably unscrupulous, but that was typical of American politicians in the 1860s. In the sources of the day, he comes alive as an incredibly charismatic and powerful leader. The Democratic editor of the Columbus Sun expressed his disgust for Ashburn by nicknaming him "Stinkee," but also feared and grudgingly admired him, writing in November 1867: "[Ashburn] is today the ablest, most adroit and influential man, black or white, in the radical ranks in Georgia. Resolute in purpose, unscrupulous as to means...To those who doubt the ability of 'Stinkee'...We would say that he has ruled the niggers and white men of his party in this section alike with a rod of iron...We have seen him subdue a rebellion in the camp. It was done with an ease and dispatch that would not have disgraced the Emperor of the French.” The mob that killed Ashburn did so because he loudly and persistently advocated political rights for African Americans, an unpardonable sin to most southern whites in his time. Ashburn’s lynching ushered in a reign of terror against black people that lasted nearly a century, snuffing out their nascent rights earned under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

Primus King, a great unsung hero in Georgia history, helped restore those rights. He accomplished more on a practical level to guarantee black Georgians equal political rights than Martin Luther King, Jr., yet few in Georgia have ever heard of him. After Democrats regained control of state and local government in the 1870s, Georgia essentially became a one-party state. Because there was no viable Republican Party, the only election that mattered was the Democratic primary. One of the strategies to block African American political power was to deny them participation in the Democratic primary. In the early twentieth century, the Democrats claimed they were a private organization and thus could limit voting in their primary to their members—who were all white men.

In the 1940s, NAACP chapters across the South began to challenge the white primary. In early 1944, the U.S. Supreme Court in Smith v. Allright found Texas’ white primary to be unconstitutional. There had been talk in the Columbus NAACP since the Smith ruling about testing Georgia’s primary law, but as King recalled in an oral history interview in the CSU archives, “All the rest of these higher up men—they talked about [testing the white primary]. They talked about it. But, in other words, nobody put a bell around the cat’s neck. The rats talked about it, but...I told ‘em, I said, ‘I will.’” On July 4, 1944, King, a barber and pastor, walked into the old Muscogee County courthouse and attempted to vote in the white primary. A police detective grabbed him and asked, “What in the hell are you doin,’ nigger?” When King said he intended to vote, the policeman told him, “Ain’t no niggers voting today.”

King left the courthouse and walked three blocks to a lawyer’s office to initiate a suit against the Democratic Executive Committee of Muscogee County, chaired by Joseph E. Chapman. When word got out, King received many death threats. In 1979, he recalled one in particular: "An old cracker called and said: 'Are you the nigger that caused so much trouble about this voting around here in the white primary?' I replied: 'I'm not the nigger, sir, but I'm Primus King.' Then the old cracker replied: 'You must want to be put in the river.' And I said: 'Well, they've put so many Negroes in the river for nothing; I'm willin' to go in there for somethin'!' The old cracker hung up."

King's suit claimed the Democratic Executive Committee of Muscogee County had denied him the right to vote solely on the basis of race. He sought $5000 in damages. Ultimately, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld King's claim and on April 1, 1946, the Supreme Court declined to review it. King v. Chapman declared the Georgia white primary unconstitutional. The court awarded King $100 in damages and 7% per annum interest until he collected his settlement from the Muscogee Democratic Committee. King finally collected his award with interest accrued in 1977.

What courage it took for this humble man to walk alone into the courthouse on July 4, 1944! King's efforts had immediate effect. By the end of 1946, the NAACP had forty branches and 13,000 members in Georgia. In a period of fifty-one days, black voter registration went from 3,000 to 21,000. It soared from 3% of voters in 1940 to 18.8%—135,000 voters—by 1947.

Augusta Howard was another figure in Columbus history with the courage of her convictions. We remember Augusta for founding the Georgia Woman Suffrage Association in 1890—the first organization in the state dedicated to securing the franchise for women. But, as mentioned earlier, many mysteries surround Augusta. Why did she become involved in what was considered in 1890 to be a radical and "unfeminine" cause? Why, after giving her life to the movement for five years and even hosting the National American Woman Suffrage Association convention in Atlanta in 1895, did Augusta abruptly disappear from the suffrage fight? And why does her headstone in Linwood Cemetery read: "MARTYRED!"?

Very little in Augusta's background could have pointed to her eventual role as suffragist. Her family was one of Columbus' oldest and finest. In the 1830s, her ancestor John Howard helped construct the first dam across the Chattahoochee, opened the city's first textile mill, and built the first railroad in Columbus. Her great-aunt was Mary Howard Jones, wife of Seaborn Jones, a wealthy planter and entrepreneur who built the beautiful mansion St. Elmo. Her first cousins were Augusta Jane Evans, author of the popular novel of the same name, and Mary Howard Benning, wife of General Henry L. Benning.

Augusta was the youngest of eleven children, and though among the Columbus elite in lineage, hard times befell them after Augusta’s birth. Her father died when she was a small child, and the family income fell dramatically. This decline in family fortunes apparently led to her interest in feminism. Her sister Miriam Howard DuBose explained years later: “Urgent need of serious minded women in world affairs was forced upon Miss Howard’s attention through no woman suffrage paper or literature, whatsoever. She had seen none. Her mother’s yearly inescapable taxes without representation compelled her realization of gross injustices done hundreds of thousands of women assisting in supporting a government, politically classing them with MINORS, LUNATICS, TRAITORS, and FELONS.”

Augusta decided in 1890 at age twenty-five to form a society to give women a political voice. The first members were Augusta, her mother, and her four older sisters. The Howard’s affiliated their society with the leading suffrage organization, the National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA), led by Susan B. Anthony. But in the first five years, only about a dozen others from around Georgia joined the society. Columbus certainly did not welcome this suffrage association. Suffragists were generally considered “unnatural” women by both male and female. Men ridiculed the notion of equal rights for women, and women maintained they had all the rights they wanted. Augusta wrote in 1893 that the “opposition at Columbus...[was] of the most malignant and underhand sort, scrupling not at insult, lying, and slander, in hope of intimidating the few advocates of equal rights.”

Even Augusta’s brother was against them. He pressured the Columbus Enquirer into refusing to publish Augusta’s writings on suffrage.

Augusta’s greatest accomplishment as president of the Georgia Woman Suffrage Association was bringing the annual convention of the National American Suffrage Association to Atlanta in 1895. Augusta and her sisters extended the invitation at the 1894 convention in Washington. Susan B.
Anthony and some delegates wanted to keep the convention in Washington to put pressure on Congress; there was also support for Cincinnati and Detroit. But Augusta won the day by declaring:

You might hold a thousand conventions in Kansas or other places above Mason and Dixon's line and you will never hear anything about it in the South. The Georgia papers and the far Southern papers still insist that women do not want the ballot. Until you hold a convention in the South and prove to them that this is not so, they will keep saying it. In Atlanta...there can be no doubt that the Grand Opera House...could be secured and it could be packed from ceiling to pit. While a great many of them would come to laugh, many of them would go away with NAWSA membership tickets in their pockets...I believe that an effort would be made by Atlanta and the prominent business men, as well as the Georgia Woman Suffrage Association, to make the convention a successful one. While Atlanta is not in sympathy with the movement, she is always ready to help Atlanta.

The convention voted to meet in Atlanta the following year. Immediately after the convention, Susan B. Anthony, her sister Mary, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, and other officers of the NAWSA visited the Howard sisters at Sherwood Hall for a few days. (I love to imagine Susan B. Anthony in Columbus.)

Here is where the mystery of Augusta deepens. After the convention, Augusta resigned from the Georgia Woman Suffrage Association and never again played an active role in the movement. Why, after her extremely visible and vocal activism, did she disappear from the fray? She was only thirty years old — what did she do with herself for the rest of her life? Why does her tombstone say she was "martyred"? I hope to help answer some of these questions.

Also among Columbus' progressive reformers is Theo J. McGee. Born in Butler at the turn of the century, he moved to Columbus to practice law in 1922. A comfortable member of the white elite, McGee over time grew in a different direction from most of his peers. He initially accepted the prevalent view that whites were superior, and that the Negro should be kept in his place. But as an adult, he listened to ministers who spoke of brotherhood and equality, and he came to see fair and equitable treatment of all humans a Christian principle by which to live.

The strongest expression of his beliefs was his lifelong commitment to providing decent housing for Columbus' poor. The Family Welfare Bureau was the city's main private relief agency in the early twentieth century, and McGee became its director in 1923. That served as a springboard for his chairmanship of the Columbus Housing Authority (CHA) from 1938 until his retirement in 1971, an agency dedicated to upgrading substandard housing for the poor. Under his leadership, the CHA built the Peabody and Booker T. Washington developments, the first public housing in Columbus.
Cleaning up "The Bottoms" was a major priority in the 1940s. The Bottoms was a historic black neighborhood on low ground along Weracoba Creek below Wynn’s Hill. Landless African Americans squatted there after the Civil War, and it soon grew into a vibrant neighborhood. But it was full of shoddy shotgun houses that lacked electricity, running water, or indoor bathrooms. Residents often worked as domestic servants in the big houses in the prestigious Overlook neighborhood just up the hill. The CHA built Warren Williams Homes there as public housing, but most of The Bottoms was subdivided and sold to private developers. McGee deemed much of the resultant housing unsightly. He lamented, "Though some considerable progress has been made, the majority of the public is insensitive to the ugliness and slovenliness that still widely prevails." In the 1960s, he believed Lady Bird Johnson’s slogan “Keep America Beautiful” should have been “Make America Beautiful.”

McGee was labeled a “socialist” and a “communist,” but such slurs did not deter him. In fact, he delighted in poking his critics in the eye. In the conformist 1950s, many Columbus business leaders railed against government “socialized housing.” McGee vigorously defended public housing projects that “were constructed to take the place of several hundred decaying little shacks.” “I suppose if these public housing projects are called ‘social housing,’” he maintained, “we could with equal propriety describe the eliminated shacks as ‘capitalistic housing.’”

Unwilling to compromise, McGee declared, “Slum areas ought to be cleared—all of them. Such housing conditions constitute one of the strangest paradoxes in our American way of life. We are always justly boasting of our American way—our industrial genius, our high income, and incomparable freedom—yet while we brag about the number of our automobiles, telephones, radios, and bath tubs—all of our gadgets, fully one-third of our urban populations are compelled to live in houses unsuited for habitation. These depressed housing areas, too, it must be noted, are part of our American way of life—withal a very shameful part.” In an incredibly progressive statement for a white elite Columbushite in the 1950s, McGee argued, “In Columbus the Bottoms was as much a part of the city as Overlook.” By the 1970s, McGee had become discouraged with the rate of progress in Columbus, but he was an idealist. He believed he could change the world. You have to admire him for that.

Columbus has a fascinating history filled with many colorful characters. I am having a wonderful time trying to solve some of the mysteries and put it all together in a coherent narrative. I am asking for any help Muscogiana readers can provide. Local History Corner: Dr. John Lupold

Gary S. Sprayberry

Anyone who has ever delved into the history of Columbus, Georgia, and/or the Chattahoochee Valley is familiar with the work of Dr. John Lupold. He has researched and written about this region for more than three decades, producing countless articles and monographs on the Valley’s history, people and institutions. In truth, it would be next to impossible to explore the history of Columbus without encountering or utilizing Lupold’s work. He has emerged as one of the principal caretakers of the community’s past and, as we will see, has contributed mightily to the field of local history.

Dr. Lupold, a native of South Carolina, first arrived in Columbus in 1970 after accepting a teaching post in the history department at Columbus College (later Columbus State University). He had just completed his doctoral studies at the University of South Carolina. He joined a rather large history department that included Hugh I. Rodgers, John "Jack" Myers, Billy McGee, James Dwyer, Richard Amundson, and Donald Cope. Lupold taught courses on American, southern, and Georgia history, and later developed classes in local history, genealogy, and historical preservation. In 1975, he and another history professor, Richard Hanks, created the Lower Chattahoochee Valley Historical Archives in the Simon Schwob Library at Columbus College. The two were only able to establish and secure the archives after some skillful politicking at the college and by ingratiating themselves with Loretto Chappell, a longtime librarian in Columbus and daughter to former mayor L.H. Chappell. According to Lupold, she was "the Librarian" in the city and "well tied-in" to the local power structure. She provided some crucial early support to the venture. According to the Archives web-site, "without the cooperation of Miss Chappell, the Columbus College Archives would not have been established. Her endorsements played a significant role in establishing the Columbus College Archives and in acquiring its initial and many of the subsequent collections." She donated her grandfather's personal and family library to the Archives – a massive collection that had been passed down through the Chappell family for generations. These volumes, known as the A.H. Chappell Collection, formed the nucleus of the new Archives and brought some much-needed attention to the facility and its young architects. In fact, the Columbus Ledger ran a front-page story about Chappell's generous donation, thus legitimizing the Archives in the eyes of both the public and a skeptical school administration. Since its inception, the CSU Archives has evolved into one of the most important repositories of Columbus and Chattahoochee Valley history and genealogy.

From the very beginning, Dr. Lupold held a deep interest in local and regional history. As he readily admits, he is driven by an abiding curiosity to uncover everything he can about the community in which he lives. "I like to know the terrain, the environment, what's going on, [everything]," he says. Such curiosity inspired Lupold to research various aspects of Columbus' past, including the textile industry, local architecture, different civic institutions, and many of the colorful figures who have called the Chattahoochee Valley home. His work has been published in the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, Columbus and the Valley Magazine, the Atlanta Historical Journal, the New Georgia Encyclopedia, the Dictionary of Georgia Biography, the Georgia Historical Quarterly, and the Encyclopedia of Southern Culture. In 1978, Dr. Lupold penned a sweeping history of Columbus entitled Columbus, Georgia, 1828-1978 to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the founding of the city. The book stands alongside histories by Clason Kyle, Joseph Mahan, and Nancy Telfair, as one of the seminal works on Columbus. Perhaps his most enduring contribution to genealogy and local history came with the publication of a two-volume work entitled Chattahoochee Valley Sources and Resources: An Annotated Bibliography in 1988 and 1993, respectively. Countless scholars, family historians, and journalists have utilized these massive tomes in their research. If Dr. Lupold had written nothing else, his reputation as a local historian would have been secured with these contributions. Others have agreed. In 1988, Lupold received the Governor’s Award in the Humanities for his work in local and regional history.

Dr. Lupold’s crowning achievement was the publication of Bridging Deep South Rivers: The Life and Legend of Horace King in 2004, which he co-authored with Thomas French Jr. The book, hailed as “an impressive and careful piece of research,” chronicles the life of famed bridge-builder, ex-slave, politician, and Chattahoochee Valley legend Horace King. As Lupold writes, the purpose of the book was three-fold: “to document King’s professional career,” “to separate the facts from the fiction in the Horace King lore,” and “to chronicle his life as a slave and freedman.” Lupold and French achieve all three in admirable fashion, crafting a history that is both informative and a pleasure to read. The most intriguing sections of the book deal with the various legends and myths that have developed around the figure of Horace King. Neo-Confederate groups, for example, have labeled King a “black Confederate” because of the contract work he did for the Confederate government. Others have pointed to King’s engineering and architectural skills as evidence of the nurturing and benevolent nature of slavery. Lupold dismisses such claims as “absurd” and spends large chunks of the book dispelling them. As with all of his work, Lupold skillfully employs the primary sources relating to King to extract fact from faction and reality from myth. What emerges is a complicated tale of a decidedly complicated man.

In 2004, the same year that Bridging Deep South Rivers appeared, Dr. Lupold retired from Columbus State University after thirty-four years of service to the institution. During his tenure at CSU, he served as chair of the History Department (1998-2004), sat on various civic boards and university committees, and received numerous awards and plaudits, including the Faculty Service Award in 1992 and the Educator of the Year Award in 1997. Today, Lupold continues to research, write, and give public lectures on the history of Columbus and the surrounding region.
