Pulling Brambles

Brambles ruled this insignificant plot as Columbus suckled at his mother’s breast as Jesus wept they sheltered bob white quail, rabbits, possums from bobcat and fox and red men they survived when bulldozers came thirty years ago and ran off the quail, rabbits, and possums they were exiled to an out of the way corner on my son’s fourth birthday when the Lorna Drive gang played soccer drank purple bug juice ate gooey cake and smeared themselves in it all they are here today twenty years later as I bend and pull, bend and pull feeling for roots under dwarf azaleas feeling under the mulch avoiding stickers bending and pulling slowly so as to get it all root and six foot brambled vine piling them onto the grass before I mow Brambles will rule this insignificant plot again will prevail in unforeseen futures when my son and the sons of his sons are forgotten gone compost where fresh green brambles prevail
